I. What is redistricting and why do we do it?

Depending on how the government is organized, lawmakers can either represent a whole geographic area or they can represent a part of an area that we call a “district.” For example, U.S. Senators from California represent everyone in the state, but U.S. Representatives in Congress are elected by residents of a specific election district.

Every ten years after the federal census, district lines must be adjusted to ensure that each district contains the same number of residents. This process is called redistricting: the redrawing of election district boundaries.

The FairMaps California Local Redistricting Toolkit

The U.S. Constitution requires that every American receive as close to equal representation as possible in government - for example, one congressional district shouldn't include more people than another congressional district. As time passes, the population of election districts can change dramatically, leaving some people overrepresented and others underrepresented in government. Redistricting equalizes the population between districts to help reach the ideal of equal representation.

Federal congressional and state legislative districts are redrawn by the state - either by the legislature or by some form of commission. Local redistricting is the process of redrawing the boundaries of local election districts, such as county supervisor, school board, or city council districts. The U.S. Supreme Court has held that local governments must redistrict at least once every ten years. This local redistricting is generally done using data from the federal census about who, how many, and where people live in California.¹

Redistricting determines which communities are placed together into a district and whether communities are split up across different districts. The decisions made during the redistricting process determine whether residents have fair representation in government and whether their representatives will reflect their interests.

Gerrymandering happens when the election district boundaries are drawn in a way that gives a particular set of people - like a political party or racial group, an unfair political advantage over another. The League of Women Voters opposes gerrymandering.

Democracy depends on voters having the opportunity to choose their representatives. When elected officials redraw the lines of their own districts, they get to design their own territory and choose who their voters are. This distorts representative democracy. It can lead to manipulation of various types. Racially discriminatory manipulation weakens the voting strength of targeted minority communities. Partisan manipulation favors one political party over another.

The League of Women Voters believes that to be fair, districts should be drawn in a transparent manner by politically independent special commissions that use unbiased criteria to help keep communities intact and to ensure that everyone is equally represented.

A Historical Note: The League of Women Voters of California & State Redistricting

Each state lawmaker and House of Representatives member represents people who live in a specific election “district.” These lines were traditionally drawn by the state legislature. In 2008, California voters adopted the Voters FIRST Act. Since then, every 10 years, after the U.S. Census, the California Citizens Redistricting Commission adjusts the boundary lines for California’s Congressional districts and state legislative districts to make sure each district has about the same number of people (a process called “redistricting”).

The League of Women Voters of California was a leader in the movement to create California’s independent Citizens Redistricting Commission in order to ensure that the process is transparent, equitable, and free of discrimination; that community members can provide input to shape district maps; that partisanship is minimized; and that our election district maps are drawn fairly. Furthermore, we built in rules to guarantee that Commission members reflect California’s diversity.

II. What are the rules for local redistricting?

Local redistricting involves any county, city, school district, community college district, or special district that is divided into districts or divisions. These local governments are required to review their current district boundaries and redistrict based on new population figures from the census. Beyond that, the rules vary for each government agency – whether city, county, school board, or special district. Some of the rules for the process are set by state law and some local governments adopt their own custom-made rules.

The League of Women Voters’ goal is to ensure that districts are drawn in a way that will keep communities together. Keeping communities whole, in a single political district, increases communities’ ability to influence or even determine who gets elected to represent that district. This also makes it more likely that representatives will listen to the community and be responsive to its needs.

While there are rules for state-level redistricting in California, similar criteria to guide decision-making, and requirements to ensure a transparent and open public process, do not necessarily apply at the local level. See the table of California Local Redistricting Rules referenced in Section VII below to check the rules for each form of local government.

The FairMaps California Local Redistricting Toolkit

A. Who gets to draw the new local election districts?

District boundaries are usually drawn by “incumbents,” meaning those elected politicians who are currently in office. Many incumbents will be running for re-election in the same districts where they are drawing the lines. So, for example, in most cities the current city council gets to decide on the new council districts that will be used for the next decade. There are a few exceptions, where local independent commissions have been adopted, which are discussed in Section D below.

B. Why is politician-controlled redistricting a problem?

Putting elected officials in charge of drawing their own districts creates an incentive for those officials to draw districts that are favorable either to them or to their political allies. This sometimes leads to districts that are purposefully drawn to enhance the influence of certain groups and/or to reduce the influence of other groups - for example racial and ethnic minorities or members of a favored political party. This is referred to as “gerrymandering.”

Two of the most common techniques for gerrymandering are “cracking” and “packing.” “Cracking” is when a targeted group is split up into multiple districts to dilute its voting power, so members of that group cannot elect a representative in any district. “Packing” is when a targeted group is over-concentrated into a single district to reduce its voting power in other districts, so members of that group end up with fewer representatives than their votes deserve. The “Examples of Gerrymandering” graphic on the next page illustrates how geographic areas could be unfairly divided.

The FairMaps California Local Redistricting Toolkit

Please note that odd-looking districts do not necessarily equal gerrymandering, and simple looking districts do not always mean good representation has been achieved. Districts need to reflect communities, and communities may have a wide variety of geographic boundaries.

C. What are the rules for local redistricting?

The rules for local redistricting vary. For an annotated list of the rules check the table of California Local Redistricting Rules referenced in Section VII below.

Note that each type of local California government -- county, city, school district, special district -- has different rules and different timelines for the redistricting process.

A new law, the Fair Maps Act \(AB 849 Bonta\), establishes criteria and timelines for city and county redistricting in California. These requirements do not apply to school boards or special districts.

The FairMaps California Local Redistricting Toolkit

D. Exceptions: local governments with independent commissions

Some local governments have adopted local commissions. Los Angeles, Santa Barbara, and San Diego counties have independent commissions, along with the cities of Berkeley, Chula Vista, Escondido, Long Beach, Modesto, Oakland, Sacramento, San Diego, San Francisco, and Santa Barbara. In addition, many local governments, like the cities of Los Angeles and San Jose, have citizen advisory commissions to recommend new district lines to the governing board.

Many of these cities and counties are recruiting applicants to serve on their local commissions during 2020. To find out more about how to engage with the local commissions in these areas, contact the local League of Women Voters in that area or email your question to redistricting@lwvc.org.

III. What is the timeline for local redistricting?

Local redistricting will begin sometime after the release of U.S. Census data, which must occur by April 1, 2021. The deadline for completion of local redistricting may vary by the type of jurisdiction (e.g. city council vs. school board) and by when they hold their next local election after the release of census data (e.g. whether local elections are consolidated with either the state primary election or the state general election). Check the table of California Local Redistricting Rules in Section VII below for details about timelines. Note that under state law, California's charter cities² have the ability to adopt their own timeline for redistricting.

IV. Beyond the law: options to deal with potential gerrymandering

Beyond ensuring that each local government complies with the rules that apply to it (which we definitely want to do!) local groups can advocate for more transparency and more representative districts. State law now provides a floor - a base level of requirements for jurisdictions. We can advocate for a better process than just complying with the law.

How to Advocate for a Fair Mapping Process

Meet with Elected Officials. Remind the relevant elected officials of the laws governing their redistricting, and that you are watching and care about the process. Advocate for them to request or allocate sufficient funds to support outreach efforts. Check out this Public Participation Guide for Elections Officials that was designed for the implementation of another law, the Voter's Choice Act. Many of the principles apply to any situation involving public civic engagement.

² For more information on Charter cities check cacities.org/Resources/Charter-Cities.

The FairMaps California Local Redistricting Toolkit

Public Meetings. Make sure that you show up and are prepared to make brief comments and provide feedback. Coordinate with other people and groups to strengthen the impact of your engagement.

Write and use social media! Get the word out to the community and to elected officials. Common tools are:

- Letters to elected officials
- Articles in the media
- Op-eds and letters to the editor of news publications
- Facebook, Twitter and Instagram - use the hashtag #FairMaps and #FairMaps(Jurisdiction's name)

Encourage the Use of Redistricting Best Practices. Ask elected officials not to just comply with the law, but to apply “best practices” to their process. These include:

- Enhanced Outreach. Better public outreach and increasing the number of hearings will improve both transparency and the diversity of community voices involved in the process. For example, you can suggest:
 - A dedicated web page be created for public redistricting information.
 - An easy, online way to submit written feedback be provided.
 - For example, show them this elegant online portal that San Mateo County created for Voter's Choice Act feedback.
 - Plain-language outreach materials are developed, translated in all languages commonly spoken in the community, and distributed through channels such as mailings, print media, radio public service announcements, social media, handouts sent home with school children, and community based organizations.³
 - More hearings are scheduled than required.
 - Hearings be dedicated to redistricting and not held in tandem with other time-consuming matters.
 - Hearings are held at varied times, including weekends and evenings, to help engage members of the public who can't attend hearings during traditional business hours.
 - Remote access be made available through video or phone conferencing.
 - Proceedings be videotaped and posted on a public website.
- Targeted Outreach. Encourage outreach to underrepresented communities including language-minorities, youth, people of color, and people with disabilities. For example, you can suggest:
 - Hearings be held in diverse neighborhoods, near public transit and good parking, at different times of the day and/or days of the week.
 - Translated materials, simultaneous language translation, and American Sign Language interpretation be provided.

³ The Best Practices Manual for Official Voter Information Guides and the Center for Civic Design (civicdesign.org) offer excellent ideas for well-designed, plain-language materials. These ideas can be applied more broadly than the voting context.

The FairMaps California Local Redistricting Toolkit

- Childcare and food be offered.
- All hearing spaces are ADA-compliant and accessible to people with disabilities.
- Ranked criteria. Redistricting requires making choices among competing interests, which opens the door to manipulation. Applying criteria that are ranked in order of priority (like those mandated for California state, county, and city redistricting) minimizes opportunities for abuse and helps to promote a process that will result in a more representative democracy.

Collaborate with other community-based organizations.

- Work together to elevate underrepresented groups and ensure that a diversity of voices is present in the redistricting process.
- Join forces to train people in the community as to how to participate effectively.
- Encourage residents to identify and define the boundaries of their communities and ask that the decision-making body not split their community.
- Create a plan to review maps together, show up and speak at public meetings, and submit feedback.

Many community members, especially those who have been historically underrepresented in our electorate, have never had the opportunity to provide formal public feedback. Terms of art like “public comment,” “speaker's card,” and “adjourn” may be novel. Approaching a microphone in front of an imposing dais could feel intimidating. Local Leagues are uniquely well-suited to offer coaching and support but must also be cognizant of the need to step back and help promote the voices of a diversity of leaders.

Engage with your local redistricting commission, if your city or county has one (see Section II.D. above).

- Work with community groups to recruit applicants to your local commission, with the goal of establishing a commission that is representative of your city or county's demographics.
- Consider applying to the commission yourself or inviting any of your colleagues who are committed to fair redistricting to apply.

VI. Background: the California Voting Rights Act (CVRA)

The California Voting Rights Act (CVRA) was signed into law in 2002. It builds on the Voting Rights Act enacted in 1965. In particular, the CVRA provides that at-large elections may not be used in local elections if they dilute the votes of a minority group – if, in effect, the minority group is unable to elect candidates of their choice or otherwise influence the outcome of the election. A voter – or group of voters – may sue to enforce this act. You can learn more about the CVRA here. (Note: this document is out of date, but provides basic background.)

Over the years since its passage, there have been an increased number of lawsuits and complaints based on the CVRA. As a result, more local governments are using district elections. Whether a jurisdiction engages in districting (establishing districts for the first time) or redistricting, the criteria for drawing the district lines are the same; however, some of the requirements for public participation and outreach may differ. Jurisdictions that recently districted using 2010 Census data must still engage in the redistricting process once the 2020 Census data is released.
